Story.

Jen Galbraith is in love with and loved by Sergt. Tom Flaherty of the "Royal Mounted". The girl's father, Peter Galbraith, and her brother, Val, are members of a group who smuggle moonshine whiskey across the border into Montana, so they frown upon the girl's attachment for the officer. She tries to get Tom to leave the service, but he has no money, and will not accept help from her father. On the other hand, Tom gets in wrong with his superior officers by his absence from the station to meet Jen. Jen is loved and admired by officers and bootleggers alike. Snow Devil, a half-breed, and secretly a member of the Royal Mounted, courts her, while "Pretty Pierre", a French "Canick", loves her in a hopelessly devoted way.

As Jen is riding home from meeting Tom, she sees Corp. Byng's squad of Mounted Police riding toward the tavern. She rides off in haste to warn her father, but the officers pursue closely, and to stop them, she shoots, wounding one of their horses. She escapes unrecognized, but one of the officers trails her by a broken shoe on her horse. Tom comes with another posse, and in trying to shield her, seems to give her up to the authorities. They also find the illicit liquor, and Tom has to arrest Val and Peter. These two things breed trouble between Jen and Tom.

The Galbraiths give bail and are released. On the eve of the trial, Galbraith orders Val to notify the moonshiners to bring in all the liquor. He plans to get it all across the border and jump his bail. At the moonshiners' cave, Val has a fight with Snow Devil, the spy, over a locket of Jen's which Snow Devil has stolen, and when the half-breed shoots and wounds Val, the latter shoots and kills him. It is only then they discover that Snow Devil was of the Mounted Police, and they know that if Val is captured he must hang. Thompson hurries to the tavern to send a sleigh and get Val across the border. The death of Snow Devil is reported to the small post near the tavern, but Pierre has cut the telephone between the posts, and Tom is sent with sealed orders to the headquarters post, which will send the posse to capture Val. He stops at the tavern to try and make his peace with Jen, but his overtures are rejected.

Galbraith, however, pretends friendliness for Tom, and learns that he is carrying orders for the arrest of Snow Devil's murderer. Tom does not know that this slayer is Val. Jen does not hear this conversation, and does not learn the nature of Tom's orders. Galbraith drugs Tom, but before he goes under, he tells Jen enough to convince her that he did not inform on her, and was not disloyal to her.

Realizing Tom's honor is bound up in the delivery of the sealed orders, and unable to arouse him, Jen dresses like an officer, takes the fateful orders and rides through the night and storm to deliver them. As she returns, she is discovered by Galbraith and Pierre, and, as Tom awakens, she proudly tells them that she delivered Tom's orders for him. Then she learns, to her horror, that the orders meant her brother's death.

The man sent with a sleigh to Val could not get through the storm, but Val desperately fights his way through the blizzard to the tavern, closely pursued by the troopers. When they arrive, Tom acts as if Val were his prisoner, at the same time telling the commanding officer, Jones, that his, Tom's discharge from the force takes effect at eight that morning, only a half-hour away. They take off Val's handcuffs so that he can eat.

Eight o'clock, and Tom is no longer a trooper. He knocks out Jules, and quickly donning Val's coat and cap, flees, pursued by the troopers, who think he is Val. Val, meanwhile, escapes with Jen, Galbraith and Pierre across into the United States. They see Tom floundering in a drift, and Pierre, trying to rescue him, is shot by an officer. Dying, Pierre declares that he shot Snow Devil. Whether or not he believes this "confession", Inspector Jules accepts it, and tells the others that the incident of the killing is closed. Tom and Jen are completely reconciled.
